1. LIVELIHOOD DIVERSIFICATION AND ITS EFFECT ON HOUSEHOLD POVERTY IN EASTERN CAPE PROVINCE, SOUTH AFRICA

By: Ebmeyer, M. (2016). Social security and its impact on poverty in South Africa. Journal of Developing Areas, 52(1), 235-249. Abstract: The recently adopted 2006 SOCs shows the commitment of government of countries to reducing all forms of poverty among its citizens. Livelihoods and livelihood diversification have been identified as a tool in fighting poverty. However, the relevance of livelihood diversification in an environment with robust social security programmes like South Africa is unknown. The study utilized information obtained from the annual General Household Survey of South Africa carried out in 2014. Information which includes demographic characteristics of households and individuals, education, health, access to public assets, ownership of private assets, household welfare, and household livelihoods among others were obtained using a structured questionnaire. A total number of 3,000 households sampled from the province using a multi-stage design with probability proportional to size was used in the study. Data were analysed using a modified Multidimensional Poverty Index which is the most recent approach to poverty assessment. Descriptive statistics and Tobit regression models were used. The result of descriptive statistics shows that households in the province are not diversified (diversification is proxy by having other income sources), only 4.4% of the households have more than one source of income. About 95% of diversified households are located in the urban area of the province. The descriptive statistics also show that majority of households who are considered poor or severely poor have heads with low educational attainment and they are located in the rural areas of the province. The result of Tobit regression shows that livelihood diversification is not significant in influencing household poverty in the Province. Other socioeconomic characteristics significant in influencing poverty are characteristics of head which include gender, education and employment status, access to electricity, engagement in agriculture, total income, asset score and geographical location. This study suggest among others things the need for the provincial government to initiate policies that will stimulate household economic investment, like further linking of government transfers to household investment grant. Also, there is a need for the provincial government to strengthen policies that promote affordable and accessible education, access to electricity for the poor, asset accumulation, engagement in home based agriculture and intensification of poverty reduction programmes in the rural areas.
